Olympic Coverage With Contemporary Flair

(NAPSA)—The Olympics just keep getting better. The ancient festival that originated in Greece was revived in 1896 by the efforts of Baron Pierre de Coubertin and this year the games return to Athens, the city of the festival's birth. Some aspects of the Olympics just keep improving. For example, it was very rare for women to compete at the original festivals, since women in ancient Greece lived a secluded life. Not only are there now many women competing in the modern Olympics, but some of the best event coverage will be presented by women reporters including former nationally ranked tennis player Mary Carillo (seen above), Elfi Schlegel, Andrea Joyce, Melissa Stark and Inga Hammond. Dressing these NBC broadcasters so they can cover the games stylishly is Liz Claiborne, known for its versatile, sleekly coordinated clothes.
